“ Uncle Mike and I are so happy that we saw Brandon enter and leave life WITH LOVE.

We remember thanking Brandon for loving our son Zachary. And we remember Brandon's laugh.

I'm putting excerpts from a mother's writing about her son (we can relate for Zachary and Brandon and I'm sure many can):

Loving an Addict

By Janet...

There are so many ways to die. It seems only the real death gets acknowledged but there are so many other deaths. That happens inside.

Like the death when you love an addict. The not being able to live. The death of hope. That death when you are sick with hope, and it keeps killing you .

Everyone is still alive... but there are many deaths. Even though you are all still breathing.

You live with death.

But there are no flowers, no music. The neighbors say, "Hi."

No one knows about the death that day, and the day before.

But it is death.

People don't know that you don't even know where your son is. That he is poor and homeless and sick and scary.

That you had to tell him not to call you.

You cannot help him.

But there are no flowers, no music, no floor, no place to put the grief.

Because the pain is wildly alive.

It is an open anguish.

*You die over and over again as a mother when you wonder where he is,
how he is. How? Why? You remember holding his shape, and washing him. Drying him with a towel and putting lotion on him.
Brushing back his wet hair.
You took such good care of him.*

Now he prowls the streets and hurts himself over and over again.

*That perfect precious body you took such good care of.
That precious little face.*

You feel as if you are drowning.

“ Brandon was such a sweet guy and a friend who was always there to help in our youth. Its been over 20 years since I've seen him, but his passing is heartbreaking. He was a close childhood friend of my little sister . I can just see his eyes light up as he laughed. I pray peace and healing over his family. God be with you
